TOMBOY TERRY

The door to Terry's room slammed shut with a resounding crash. Terry's mother had exactly 3 and 2 tenths seconds to make herself heard for that was the precise length of time it took Terry to reach the head of the stairs and begin her rumbling free fall to the living room.

"TERRY!" Her mother waited, hoping that she had crammed her shout into the tiny space of time. There was silence.

"Yes, mother." Terry answered, "Did you call?"

Terry's mother was stunned. Never before had she timed a well directed scream so well. "Yes, Terry. As a matter of fact, I did." She paused. Still silence. "Did you remember to pick up your father's tuxedo? It's at the head of the stairs."

"I've got it, mother. You didn't think for a moment that I would forget, did you?" Terry's voice betrayed a slight hint of hurt. "You said it was important that dad's suit get cleaned today. Gee, you make me feel, well, sort of unreliable or something."

Terry's mother sat heavily in a chair and smiled. "No, Terry, I wouldn't want to give you that impression." The rumble on the stair began and Terry was out the door.

It was Saturday and Terry had the whole day to herself. She knew that her parents trust in her was being tested for she had only one job to do, but a critical one. Deliver her father's tuxedo to the cleaners in the morning and then pick it up in the afternoon. But before 5 o'clock. Her father had an important function to attend and his one tuxedo was all important.

Terry hurried to the cleaners, arriving just as it opened. "Hmm," she thought, "I surprise even myself, sometimes." She hadn't even cut across Joe's yard in the hopes of getting an early morning glimpse of her favorite person.

The rest of the day was like any other Saturday. She wandered back to Joe's house and, when she was sure he was up and awake, started pegging rocks at his window. Joe finally came down as he always did and the two of them enjoyed his breakfast together. Then they hurried off to the sand lot where a hot game of football waited.

It was getting dark by the time Terry remembered her errand. She dropped the ball where she stood and ran off the field. "Be back next week," she shouted, and she disappeared.

It was after six when she got home. Her mother and her father were waiting for her. She sensed something was wrong. "Gee, mother, you two look as if you lost a bridge championship or something."

"It's worse than that, Terry," her father began. "Because you were late, just a 'little' late, I have had to cancel my meeting for tonight. Until you learn that 5 o'clock means 5 o'clock, you can forget about movies with Joe for a month!"

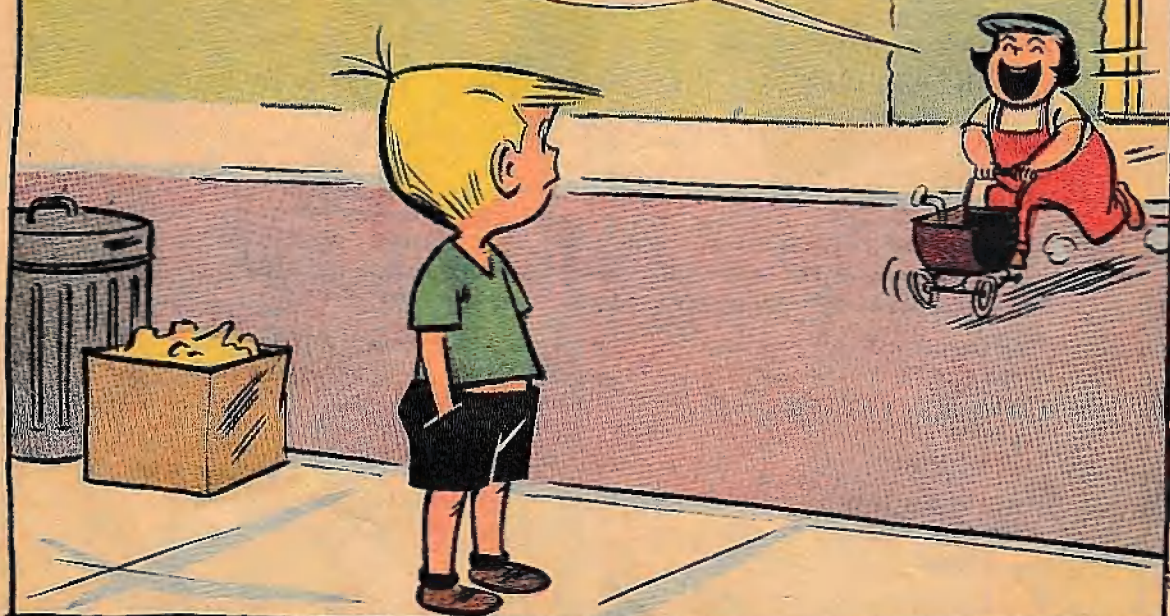

Terry was crestfallen but she knew she was wrong. So, for the next 30 days, every day at 5 o'clock the alarm in her room went off. And she heard it because that's where she was when it did go off.
